Their story is that they were alarmed by cries for help and found the minister clinking to a wharf log. He pleaded with them to save him from drowning.

A rejulable physician now makes public a statement made to him by a hostler it a Reno, Cal., hotel in 1882, by which to grasso the clergyman's hand, but failed. Then he run to the engine-house and got a long poker, and with the assistance of four sailors from the schooner hauled up on the wharf. He was still alive. They carried him to the engine-house and tried to resuscitate him in a bungling fashion.

There are a number of discrepancies in the stories told by the two men, and this led to their arrest.

Mr. Cheeseman was met by Policeman Zeever early in the evening, and was directed to the Kaighn avenue ferry. How he came to be out on the lonely wharf, a few squares distant, several hours later, cannot be explained. y cries for help and found the minister

Some friends of the minister say he had been suffering lately from the grip, and there is a possibility that he became temporarily deranged from this mainty and wandered off into the water He had not the slightest cause for sufficient.

The reason for suspecting foul play is that Mr. Cheeseman had been an ardent Prohibitionist. He had persistently fought the saloans in Camden at all times, preaching against them and doing all in his power to close them up. It is argued that by so doing he may have antagonized some victous people.
